ABOUT THIS WORKSHOP

High conflict disputes are increasing in every setting: in legal disputes, in divorce, at the workplace, between neighbours, among family members, against employers and government agencies. They often involve one or more people with high-conflict behaviour, characterized by:

- All-or-nothing thinking
- Unmanaged emotions
- Extreme behavior
- Preoccupation with blaming others
- Prolonged, unresolved conflict
- Drawing in many other people
- Draining energy, time and resources

Yet these disputes can generally be managed by understanding high conflict behaviour and using skills to manage the dispute that are often different from ordinary conflict resolution methods.

This intensive two-day training will focus on understanding and practicing conflict management skills that are not obvious and natural. They will be practiced in small steps in several role-play exercises which involve high-conflict emotions and behaviour. Professionals will gain skills and confidence which will assist them in handling any high-conflict situation, whether in formal mediation or other dispute settings.
